AN ENGLISHWOMAN'S IMPRESSIONS OF
MANNERS AND SOCIETY IN RUSSIA,

DURING A TEN YEARS' RESIDENCE IN THAT COUNTRY.

With Woodcuts. Post Svo. 10s. 6d.

The Englishwoman in Russia. "Our readers will observe that throughout our remarks we have relied on the statements of an anonymous author. But we have various grounds, which we can barely glance at, for receiving them with confidence. In the first place, they correspond substantially with the statements upon similar topics of Haxthausen and Custine, and, in addition to this, they convey with them the impression that we are dealing with a truthful person. Her volume displays little of the practised writer's art; but it is clear, calm, sensible, and apparently candid. She is properly careful to disguise the names of the persons to whom she refers, and whom she may have met in Russian society. She is frequently, by the remembrance of much hospitable treatment, induced to say all she can in their praise. She cordially remembers the warmheartedness of her Russian friends, and bids adieu to them for ever with regret; and she may or may not have published her impressions reluctantly, but, at all events, we are disposed to receive them as accurate and authentic."—Times.

The Englishwoman in Russia. "Since the 'Letters from the Baltic,' we have met with no book descriptive of the society and manners of a foreign nation, comparable with these impressions of a ten years' residence in the land of our astute and powerful enemy. It is no mere passing impression of the points of difference of life and feeling, which the most careless traveller can gather from the surface of social life as he rides or drives post-haste through a new country, that our gifted authoress presents in her present volume. Her views are the results of experience, and her opinions such as study alone can warrant a writer in expressing."—Britannia.

The Englishwoman in Russia. "Ten years of domestication in Russia might be expected to produce some knowledge of the country, when the person so domesticated was an English lady, free from prejudice, frank in her disposition, shrewd in her perceptions. Ladies are among the best observers of our home life, and the writer of this book proves unquestionably that she has all the qualifications necessary to a trustworthy reporter. Her book, written without pretension, is admirably put together; it is not a diary, but a planned and well-considered piece of writing; and though it consists mainly of incidents belonging to the author's personal experience, they are all such as serve to display in the most striking way some general fact, the author's purpose being to illustrate not herself, but Russia, to tell not any part of her own inner life, but something of the inner life of a great empire concerning which too many false accounts are current. It is a very valuable as well as a very delightful book."—Examiner.
