

must be a necessary relation between the races of animals and the epoch at which they appear. It is necessary, therefore, in order to comprehend Creation, that we combine the study of extinct species with that of those now living, since one is the natural complement of the other. A system of Zoölogy will consequently be true, in proportion as it corresponds with the order of succession among animals.