

Thus, when treating in the following chapter of Religion and Philosophy, we shall bear in mind that both deal with a twofold problem: the practical problem of affording a firm foundation and rule for human conduct, and the further problem of affording a view of the totality of things.