

the system all its internal operations proceed quietly, steadily, and constantly, whether the mind be absorbed in thought or wholly vacant. The kind of existence resulting from these functions alone, and to which our attention has hitherto been confined, must be regarded as the result of mere vegetative, rather than of animal life. It is time that we turn our views to the higher objects, and more curious field of inquiry, belonging to the latter.