

CHAPTER IV.

	PAGE
Quiet hours in the Ebb with Uncle Sandy.—Curious anecdotes of crabs and lobsters.—Notices of the lump-fish.— Amphitrites and their masonry.—Dye fish and beautiful exotic shells.—Evidence that the relative levels of sea and land are not altering.—Effect of winds upon the tides.—Philosophy of the drift current and gulf stream.—Instincts and habits of insects.—Wild bees and their robbers.—Important discoveries of fragmentary vegetable and animal remains.—The dropping cave of the Cromarty Sutors.—Superstition of the townspeople.—An apparition.—The Sutor caves as seen by torchlight.—The “Puir Wife’s Meal Kist” and the Pigeon Caves.—Exploration of Doocot,—formation of its stalactites and petrified moss,—view from the interior.—Imprisonment by the tide.—Want of wings sometimes a great inconvenience.—Night, and a storm.—Imaginary evils often greatly worse than real ones.—A midnight voice from the rocks.—Deliverance.—The incident immortalized in some enormously bad verse.....	59

CHAPTER V.

“Letters of a Village Governess,” and poor Miss Bond.—My dislike of the common amusements of the school.—A run of ill-luck in my sports.—The sea-shore become a miniature muster-ground.—Essays in bark-building and navigation unsuccessful.—Unlucky accident, and “break” with a friend.—A visit to the Highlands.—Family worship.—Honesty a better security than locks and bolts.—The valley of the Gruids,—its interesting features.—Cousin William’s guests.—Authenticity of Ossian.—A genuine Celtic breakfast.—Clan stories and legends of the district.—“No fool like an old fool”.....	81
---	----

CHAPTER VI.

Another journey to the Highlands.—A delightful residence.—Scenery of Loch Shin.—Memorials of the barbarism of our ancestors fast disappearing.—Charms and love-filters.—Celtic theory of dreaming.—A congenial companion.—Luxury of seeing one’s self in print.—A suit of tartan inconsistent with a knowledge of Gaelic.—An interesting excursion.—A sad story in a solitary valley.—The salmon leap.—A lodge in the wilderness.—A sublime poem greatly damaged