

CHAPTER XIII.

	PAGE
A terra incognita. —Contentment sometimes rather a vice than a virtue.—A genius.—A grave difference between porridge with, and porridge without milk.—Relative powers of fairies and ice to walk off with great stones.—Flora of Gairloch.—Law of increase in the animal and vegetable world,—the same applies to man.—View of the western islands.—Differences between the productions of the eastern and western coasts of Scotland.—Submarine scenery.—Primitive arts of uncultivated districts.—Gloomy prospects of the cotters,—their Celtic blood not the only cause of their indolence.—A resurrectionist.—Sabbaths in Flowerdale.—Poverty of the Highlanders.....	257

CHAPTER XIV.

A sad Accident.—Belief in a particular Providence natural to the mind.—The last eagle of Cromarty Hill.—The ancient records of geology confirmed by the present extinction of animal species on the globe.—Resolve to seek my fortune among the stone-cutters of Edinburgh.—Scenery of the Frith of Forth.—Distant view of the Scottish capital.—An unfortunate patrimony.—Edinburgh a city of the past and present.—“A Highlander newly come to Scotland.”—A cultivated and fenced country less beloved by a people than a wild, open one.—The carboniferous system.—Visions of science.—Serfdom in the coal districts.—Collier women of Niddry.—The democratic watchword “Liberty and Equality” faulty in its philosophy.—Moral degradation in the environs of Edinburgh.—My lodging.....	284
---	-----

CHAPTER XV.

Disaffection toward religious establishments among the working-men of Scotland.—My fellow-lodgers.—Irreligion among the masons.—Family worship established in our cottage.—Habits of dissipation among the masons.—The province of intelligence in reforming the morals.—The nobler virtues unknown to blackguards.—Charles the hero of our party.—Evil effect of the practice of promiscuous imprisonment.—Intolerance of new sects.— Strike among the masons.—Scene in a public house.—Human nature a difficult problem.—Evils of strikes .—The self-conceit of the young a wise provision.—“Old Alie, the witch,” and “Davie, the apprentice.”—A city playhouse.....	308
---	-----