

interesting must it be for those who have been born members of this international republic of learning to trace the way in which this confederation has grown up what have been the different national contributions to its formation, and how the spirit of exact science, once domiciled only in Paris, has gradually spread into all countries, and leavened the thought and literature of the world.